Moritzburg Castle lies about 13 kilometres (8.1 mi) northwest of Dresden. It is named after Duke Moritz of Saxony, who had a hunting lodge built there between 1542 – 1546. In 1723, Augustus the Strong acquired a four-poster bed for his Japanese palace, which had approximately a million peacock, pheasant, guinea hen and duck feathers woven into the canvas. Upon acquisition,

Augustus had the curtains removed and turned into wall hangings, inspiring the room's name, Federzimmer, or "feather room". Examples of Chinese, Japanese and Meissen porcelain are shown in the historical Porzellanquartier ("porcelain quarter"). This exhibition displays porcelain depicting hunting, exotic and mythological motifs as well as animal figurines that are relating to Moritzburg's original determination as a hunting lodge.

Pillnitz Castle was the summer residence of many electors and kings of Saxony. Today, the palace houses the Kunstgewerbemuseum (Arts and Crafts Museum) of the Dresden State Art Collections and the Schlossmuseum (Palace Museum). The castle complex consists of the Wasserpalais (Riverside Palace) on the riverfront; the Bergpalais (Upper Palace) on the hillside, both Baroque with Chinoiserie elements; and the later Neoclassical Neues Palais (New Palace), which links them together on the east side. The buildings enclose a Baroque garden and are surrounded by a large public park. The Arts and Crafts museum holds an important collection of lacquer furniture and Japanese katagami.

Opened in 1751, the church was originally dedicated to the Bohemian Saint John of Nepomuk. Since 1976, it serves the memory of the victims of February 13, 1945. The Dresden sculptor Friedrich Press (1904 – 1990) created the altar and Pietà in the Cathedral's Gedächtniskapelle (memorial chapel), made out of Meissen porcelain. In the crypt, the heart of King Augustus the Strong is buried along with the last King of Saxony and the remains of 49 other members of the Wettin family.

The Church of Our Lady was built between 1726 – 1743 after the plans of George Bähr (1666 – 1738) as a Lutheran church. It was nearly completely destroyed in the bombing of Dresden during World War II, and the remaining ruins were left for 50 years as a war memorial, following decisions of local East German leaders. Starting in 1994, after the reunification of Germany, the church was rebuilt. The reconstruction of its exterior was completed in 2004, and the interior in 2005.

Fürstenzug (Procession of Princes)

Augustusstraße, 01067 Dresden

The Fürstenzug (Procession of Princes) is a large mural of a mounted procession of the rulers of Saxony. It was originally painted between 1871 and 1876 to celebrate the 800th anniversary of the Wettin Dynasty, Saxony's ruling family. In order to make the work weatherproof, it was replaced with approximately 23.000 Meissen porcelain tiles between 1904 and 1907. With a length of 102 meters (335 ft.), it is known as the largest porcelain artwork in the world. The mural displays the ancestral portraits of the 35 margraves, electors, dukes and kings of the House of Wettin between 1127 and 1904.

The Chinese Pavillon in Dresden is the only historic original building of the Chinese imperial period in Germany. On the occasion of the first international Hygiene Exhibition in Dresden, the pavilion was built 1911 in Shanghai, and was then shipped in parts to Germany and rebuilt in Dresden. After the exhibition, the Chinese government gave the complete pavilion with interior decoration to the city of Dresden as a gift. The building almost completely burnt down in 1997, but was rebuilt and renovated between 2007 – 2015.

The Albrechtsburg is a late Gothic castle that dominates the town center of Meißen. It stands on a hill above the river Elbe, adjacent to the Meißen Cathedral. In 1710 King Augustus II the Strong established the Königlich-Polnische und Kurfürstlich-Sächsische Porzellan-Manufaktur (Royal-Polish and Electoral-Saxon Porcelain Manufactory), which was the first European hard-paste porcelain manufacture, at the castle under the supervision of Johann Friedrich Böttger (1682 – 1719). Meißen porcelain was produced at the Albrechtsburg until manufacturing moved to its present location in 1863.

Porzellansammlung, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen Dresden

Wednesday, 13 – Thursday, 14 June 2018

The collections of European and non-European arts and crafts comprise more than 90,000 objects from antiquity to the present day, covering items from the classical fields of collection, such as ceramics, porcelain, glass, textiles, gold and silverware, decorative and utilitarian pewter, common metals, wrought iron, wood and stone sculptures, particularly late Gothic wood carvings, furniture and wooden implements, coins, medals and badges. The museum's textile collection is particularly rich and boasts a wide spectrum ranging from early Coptic textiles to Bauhaus and present-day fabrics. Art Nouveau, Art Deco and Functionalism are focal points in nearly all fields and lend the collection its unique profile. Other major areas of the collection are 20th century arts and crafts and design.
